Electron Theory of Metals I. M. Lifshits,2013-05-14 It took us a long time to write this book. In 1959, two of us (Lifshits and Kaganov) published a review of the mechanics of electrons with a complex dispersion law. About that time, geometrical terms such as extremal sections, curvatures, diameters, limiting points began to appear in papers on the electron theory of metals. They were followed by terms quite unusual in the scientific literature: monsters, pockets, arms, sheets, and so on. With their excitingly shaped figures, papers on the electron theory of metals began to resemble catalogs of exhibitions of abstract or ultramodern sculpture. The modern theory of metals was passing through its romantic period. Each newly interpreted Fermi surface and each discovery of a new structure sensitive phenomenon was an emotional experience for the authors and readers alike. The attitude of the theoreticians was epitomized by phrases such as This method or this phenomenon can be used to reconstruct the Fermi surface . . . , which were found at the end of almost every paper on the electron theory of metals. The experimentalists selected convenient methods, being guided not so much by the elegance of a particular method as by its experimental capabilities. Gradually, the romantic approach gave way to a systematic activity, which resulted in the interpretation of the energy spectra of the majority of metals. There were some unavoidable disappointments.

The humanistic image of man using Carl Rogers as an example

Anna-Maria Skora, 2022-02-02 Seminar paper from the year 2006 in the subject Pedagogy - Science, Theory, Anthropology, University of Paderborn, language: English, abstract: The aim of this paper is the representation of the human image of humanism using Rogers as a representative of humanism and the illustration of this using an example. In the first chapter, the definition of "image of man" follows. In the second chapter, the main theses of humanism are explained and underpinned by Carl Rogers' theory of client-centred psychotherapy. In the third chapter, the humanistic image of man and Roger's theory are applied to an example. Finally, a statement on humanistic theory follows. Human behavior can be explained if one knows what image of man a person has. That means on the one hand the image of man is an explanatory model for a person's behavior and on the other hand you can develop specific action strategies based on this if you know what image of man a person has. You can interpret problems or situations on the basis of a human image. (cf. König 2005, p.34) Every human image is always linked to a conviction or a teaching and every human being has a very specific human image or a mixture of different human images, even if people are not always aware of this fact. For example, I would not claim of myself that I always represent a humanistic view of man. There are many images of man in education, such as the rationalistic, behavioristic or humanistic image of man. The latter will be discussed in more detail.
