Employee Or Independent Contractor Dave Nelson Stewart,1980 The distinction between an employee and an independent contractor is crucial in the application of the federal employment tax laws. If a worker is classified as an employee, the employer must (1) withhold income taxes, (2) withhold social security taxes, (3) match the social security taxes paid by the employee, and (4) pay unemployment taxes. If the worker is classified as an independent contractor, the employer need not pay or withhold any of the above mentioned taxes. Instead, the independent contractor is responsible for paying his own income and self-employment taxes. The Internal Revenue Code statutorily defines several occupational categories that are treated as employees for employment tax purposes. The most prominent of these categories is that of a common law employee. However, the scope of the Code and Regulations is sufficiently limited to leave the common law employee definition shrouded in uncertainty.
